Concentrated aqueous solutions of indium nitrate were investigated by X-ray diffraction. The obtained results are interpreted by assuming the existence of (local) cubic structures of molecular aggregates coordinated by cations. The existence of different types of aggregates (without and with coordinated anions) is discussed and the contributions for the diffracted X-ray intensity from the different shells of complexed cations is examined too.