This presentation will critically evaluate the concepts, theories, and ideas underpinning modern crystal engineering efforts, with a view to stimulating a constructive, community-wide conversation about the current state of the art [1]. Some of our recent efforts to further develop existing guidelines for the design of molecular cocrystals and solid solutions will also be discussed, along with a brief description of an alternative and underused method for the preparation of novel cocrystals [2].